WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 24.

A FOX IN A FIX.—A fox hunt in New York State, near Poughkeepsie, a few days ago, came to an end in the following singular manner. The fox took to the woods in which was a ledge of rocks, and in the rocks was a fissure 14 inches wide at the outside, and just large enough at the other end for a rabbit to crawl through. The opening or tunnel is cone shaped. When the hunters reached the ledge the fox was found to be firmly wedged into the fissure by the hips, where he had been driven by the hounds. All of the hunters vainly endeavored to extricate the animal.

It was becoming dark, and the party concluded to return to the woods the following morning with a crowbar and pick. At sunrise the party was ready. So was the fox, sitre and well. Several vigorous blows with a sledge-hammer failed to loosen the rocks, which, like a vise, encompassed the fox. A strap from a harness was wound around the forelegs of the fox and also around the crowbar. Two of the hunters took hold of the end of the crowbar and used it as a lever. The forelegs of the fox were literally wrenched out from the sockets. Rarely or ever a fox makes a cry of pain, but in this instance a plaintive wail was uttered by the animal. To put an end to its misery it was shot.
